and B. G. West, chief clerk to the committee, said, "I suppose so."

Early morning and after they had gone carefully over the points of his disavowal of Russia, Dr. Trammell announced that the house would ask council to make the appropriation of $250 necessary to install the plant.

THREE BROTHERS TO DIE FOR MURDER OF COUPLE

(By Associated Press.)

MILTON Fla., July 26.—James, Peter and Barclay Rogers brothers, were sentenced in circuit court here to be hanged for the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Weimann, who were shot to death in their cottage near here.

Mr. Weimann was eighty-two years old and his wife was thirty. It is supposed to have been the motive.

The three brothers were convicted by a jury here after a half day's deliberation. Governor Trammell said he would not commute the sentence of the two other men are to be tried at the same term of court in connection with the killing.

"The paper, you have seen a lot since we were together?"

"Yes, and you, too, I replied."

"That's terrible situation over there," he commented. "How can we Christian peoples stop this war? How can the churches stop it?" he asked me.

"The churches," he said, "churches cannot stop this war. I don't know a way to stop it. You cannot stop it. What situation over there is. You have not been there. I wish you knew the situation over there. I would understand this war better. There is no way I know of to stop this war until Great Britain—unless she is defeated after every ounce of her energy is exhausted, has ceased that military menace which with sword and rifle is threatening the peace of the world. Russia, she has it on its knees."

"That military power has devoted fifty years to the war," he said. "Russia has spent ten months preparing for war. It is not possible to stop this war. It is many in check. The war will not tend until that terrible military force is destroyed. The nations of the world must be made the Christian nations of this world."

Bryan interrupted me. He had two, which recommended for passage by the House. Representative Connor of Spalding called for the consideration of charges made against Chief Justice R. B. Russell, of the court of appeals, by W. T. Moyer, formerly Judge Russell's secretary, now a member of the Atlanta bar.

An investigating committee of five, as proposed by Mr. Connor's resolution, was appointed by the House. The committee was allowed by the house to have a standing committee at the army. Representative Connor is of Iowa. The committee consists of members are Representative Olive, of Richmond, Griffin, of Louisiana; Matthews, of Ebert, and Evans, of Nevada. The house refused to raise the number of members to six, as proposed by the or from five to ten.

The committee will make a complete investigation and will report back to the house.

The investigating committee met immediately following the adjournment of the house, and is now engaged in investigation and is expected to begin the investigation in the offices of the prison.

The house on Monday passed a special appropriation bill carrying $1,500 to the cost of conducting the investigation.

News And Comment In General Assembly

GRITFIN BOARD OF TRADE AGAINST PERSONS' TAX BILL

Members of the legislature have received copies of a resolution adopted by the Griffin and Spalding county board of trade opposing the passage of the persons' tax amendment bill now before the general assembly.

The resolution reads as follows: "Resolved, By the Griffin and Spalding county board of trade in regular meeting assembled:

First, We regard as exceedingly ill-considered the amendment to the state tax laws, now pending in the Georgia legislature, and known as the Persons' bill. We believe the injurious effect of such a law would greatly outweigh any possible benefit to be derived by the state through its enactment, even though it might produce an increased income.

"Second, That we respectfully request and urge our representatives in the house and senate to earnestly and actively oppose the passage of this bill."

SENATOR BOYKIN HAS THIRTY-THREE BILLS.

Senator Boykin, of the Seventeenth, has a rather unique plan for revising and improving the methods of keeping books in the offices of the various courts, keeping records of cases and transfers and increasing the efficiency of the court's recording system and the land title and personality title system generally.

Instead of introducing one voluminous bill, which would cover all of the changes which he wishes to make, and which, if it ever were read and digested by the senators, might fail to pass largely because of its size and complexity, Senator Boykin has drawn up thirty-three bills, each taking up a portion of the reforms he is seeking.

Prior to Monday he had introduced two of these bills; Monday he introduced eight of them, and he has more to come.

The senator's idea in doing this is that it would be better to pass some forms started at once, rather than try to force all of the provisions through in one bill.

BRANNEN AND RICE HAVE BIG BUMPS OF PATIENCE.

L. G. Brannen, chief clerk of the Georgia senate, and Charles F. Rice, calendar clerk, have a hard row of stumps to hoe.

Mr. Brannen is supposed to take charge of all bills introduced and passed and up for second readings as soon as they are read, so that he can record them upon the minutes of the senate. The bills are thrown down by Assistant Secretary Hansell to a little ledge above Mr. Brannen's desk. He reaches up to the ledge and pulls down bills by the handful—sometimes. Often his hand grasps the empty air.

Then it's up to him to look around the press table, where, more than likely, he will find his batch of bills being copied assiduously by three busy newspaper men who think more of informing the great Georgia public than the keeping of the senate's minutes. Or else, Mr. Brannen will find several of his bills in the hands of senators, who have passed them, are reading them over to see what they provide. But Mr. Brannen is good-natured, and long service in the senate has added to his bump of patience. So he gets his minutes fired up in shape somehow or other, in spite of the interference.

Charles F. Rice, sitting to the left of the president's desk, with the senate calendar before him, has just about the same worrisome time of it. If one of the newspaper men overlooks a bill on Mr. Brannen's desk and finds it there, perhaps just at the instant that Mr. Rice is about to inscribe it upon the permanent records of the senate. Then in addition to this, there are one or two pages who delight in turning on the electric fan which rests three feet from Mr. Rice's ear. Mr. Rice doesn't like the fan at all, anyway, and, when it blows four or five bills from his desk to the floor, as it often does, his liking for it lessens. Verily, working in the senate is no soothing bed of roses.

AGE OF ALL FEMALES REQUIRED BY NEW BILL.

Parents or guardians are required to register with the county ordinary the name and age of their unmarried females, under the terms of a bill introduced in the house Monday by Representative Johnston, of Appling county.

The purpose of the author is not to make the young ladies and old maids of the state by making public their age, but to prevent the issuance of marriage licenses for families below the marriageable age.

As the law now stands, a fellow can go to the ordinary's office and represent his sweetheart's age as he pleases and obtain a license to marry her.

Often the sweetheart is a mere child, but the law makes no provision whereby the ordinary can ascertain this fact before issuing the license.

Hence the bill by Mr. Johnson.

TIMBERLY RAGLAND A FARMER'S LEGISLATOR.

Representative Finley Ragland, of Talbot county, is not only one of the most experienced members of the general assembly but he is one of the most popular. His constituents have learned that he represents them and their interests in a faithful and able manner, and they indicate that they realize this fact, returning him to the legislature from term to term.

Speaker Burwell also recognizes Mr. Ragland's excellent qualities and the fact accounts for the responsible and important committee assignments given him. Mr. Ragland is constantly on the job.

SUIT FOR ALIMONY IS SETTLED BY AGREEMENT

Mrs. Mary S. Cook and James L. Cook have entered into a signed agreement to settle Mrs. Cook's suit for alimony, and the agreement has been made the order of the court by Judge Pennington.

Mrs. Cook is to retain an equity in property at 129 Cleburne avenue, all the furniture in the house and a savings deposit in the Atlanta National bank, which aggregates over $1500. Cook is also to pay her $1,000. This is to constitute a full and complete settlement of all claims for temporary and permanent alimony and attorney's fees. Cook is not to be responsible for any outstanding obligations of Mrs. Cook.

Mrs. Cook was represented by Bryan & Middlebrooks, Attorney Thomas H. Scott and Attorney Thomas J. Lewis. Cook was represented by Attorney John A. Boykin.

boys in attendance upon the sessions of the house and meetings of his committees. He has long since learned that the best legislator is not necessarily he who introduces the most bills, but rather the member who gives the most intelligent and conscientious attention to the work in hand.

One of Mr. Ragland's chief concerns is to see to it that no territory is taken from Talbot county for the creation of a new county and he has been eminently successful in preventing this.

Municipal Aid for Industrial Development.

Councilman Ashley's ordinance to establish a municipal industrial bureau offers fertile opportunities for Atlanta's development. An official organization of this kind, co-operating with commercial bodies, could render valuable service in exploiting the city's resources and in attracting investors.

The federal government, through its department of commerce, is exerting itself to upbuild the nation's trade in foreign countries, and in every legiti-mate way is seeking to promote industrial expansion. State governments are doing similar work in their particular fields. Municipal governments can well afford to follow these constructive examples and devote themselves as far as is expedient and right to the advancement of the community's business and manufacturing interests.

Enterprise of this character has been left very largely to civic associations. They have done praiseworthy and effective work, but they are entitled to a more generous and more definite measure of official support. Several years ago the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce organized an industrial bureau which has brought many new manufacturers to the city and has contributed in sundry other ways to the community's enrichment. In like manner was established the convention bureau which has brought hundreds of important meetings and thousands of visitors to Atlanta. These interests are distinctly public interests, deserving official recognition and aid.

A municipal bureau devoted to such ends would conflict in no wise with existing agencies; on the contrary, it would strengthen them and would lead to larger undertakings beyond their province and resources. Properly conducted, it would add greatly to the city's prestige and would be of service to all the people.

Public sentiment, we believe, is pretty well against hard times.

The same man who used to refer to the alleys now speaks of the war chances of the Eysatians.

Colonel Roosevelt again has something to say against molybdenum and nephews. Sometimes we think the world really doesn't move, or maybe it is the coldest who is at a standstill.

Our Need of Aeroplanes.

In Orville Wright's opinion, our national defense requires two thousand aeroplanes, of which we now have only about a score. Though the planes themselves could be built readily enough, much time would be needed to equip them, particularly as regards motors and pilots. "It would take two years," he says, "for this country to develop anything like an adequate aerial fleet."

In view of the broad and telling part which aircraft play in the present war, the United States should look promptly to the aeronautic needs of its own army and navy. Events leave no doubt that had either the Allies or the Germans lacked aeroplane service, the campaigns both in the West and the East would have taken a very different course; and, perhaps, they would have been determined months ago.
The aeroplane has proved invaluable for scouting purposes and for range finding in long distance artillery fire. It has been the army's eye, detecting the enemy's movements, ascertaining his numbers, revealing dangers and advantages which otherwise would have been unknown. As an adjunct of the navy, it has proved scarcely less useful. With the help of the aviators, the warships of the Allies at the Dardanelles have been enabled to reach forth which seemingly were beyond the harm of the biggest guns.

It is a singular fact that the country which gave the world this wonderful invention has been most negligent in utilizing it as a means of national defense. There are many points at which our army and navy need strengthening, but few at which they are so conspicuously deficient as in aeronautic service. It is to be hoped that Congress at its next session will heed the appeals of the war department and the navy department in this vitally important particular.

Autocratic Russia seems to be about the only European country which is free from internal dissension.

Not to mention names, we know Georgia towns which will never know whether we have a new prohibition law or not.

The Attack on the Orduna.

The situation between Germany and the United States is rendered more than ever serious by the atrocious submarine assault on the steamship Or-duna. Bound from Liverpool for New York and carrying no munitions of war or other contraband, this vessel with her more than two hundred passengers, a score of whom were Americans, offered no shadow of provocation for attack. Yet, without warning, she was fired upon by a German submarine, once with a torpedo, and, that failing, six times with shells. The fact that she and the noncombatants aboard escaped the fate of the Lusitania was the result of happy chance, not of any consideration on the part of the German craft. Indeed, the only difference in principle between this episode and the Lusitania is the difference between attempted and actual murder.

It had been hoped until now that Germany would comply in act, if not in formal acknowledgment, with our Government's just demands that the lives of neutrals and noncombatants on merchant ships be respected. Following the latest American note to Berlin, it had been observed with satisfaction that German submarines were attempting to halt enemy merchants before firing upon them, and it was believed that the danger of another Lusitania outrage was virtually past. But the sudden and unwarranted attack on the Orduna leaves little or no basis for such optimism. Rather, the impression is given that however fair the promises of Berlin may be there is scant assurance of their fulfillment.

The Orduna was even less liable to torpedoing than was the Lusitania. She was bound for a neutral and friendly shore. She was wholly unarmed.
She carried no contraband or war munitions, which Germany has made its pretext for lawless submarine attacks. Women and children composed most of her passenger list, and there were twenty or more Americans aboard her. The destruction of such a vessel could have availed Germany nothing. The attempt to destroy her could not have been prompted by any hope of advantage. It was contrary to the simplest dictates of humanity as well as to the plainest law of nations.

Are we to interpret this latest exhibition of Prussian madness as defiance of those principles for which the United States is contending and of those rights on which our Government is insisting in its correspondence with Berlin? Are the lives of American citizens traveling on passenger ships, which are peaceful, even though they be the ships of a belligerent, to have no consideration? Is Germany determined to continue outraging American sentiment and force this nation from its neutral and pacific policy?

It remains to be seen what explanation will be offered for this indefensible act, but there can be no doubt as to the gravity of the act itself nor of its serious bearing on the present relationships of the two countries.

But in after years if a man refuses to let his wife buy her neckties she imagines that he has ceased to love her.

Bankers and Farmers.

The happier and more helpful relations which have arisen between business and agricultural interests were emphasized at the recent meeting in Chicago of the American Banker-Farmer conference.
The work of this organization, which was formed a few years ago, was indicated by one of its members who declared: "We have encouraged the great movement for farm demonstrators and have urged soil surveys and a careful study of the commercial fertilizer propaganda. Our committees are working for better rural schools, fitted to the needs of citizenship and consolidated wherever possible. We know that commerce and a better marketing system begin on the country road, and that good roads lead to more good directions than can be enumerated. We know that the wholesome, prosperous country town is in an absolute necessity, and that community building is one of the big needs and tasks of the nation." These goodly endeavors are being carried forward through the co-operative thought and energy of bankers and farmers. Groups of men who once were divided by indifference or prejudice, and sometimes by actual antagonism, are now working together for their own and the country's common interest.

This wholesome spirit is especially manifest in Georgia. Not only our bankers also but our merchants and manufacturers and railway managers and more intelligently concerned in rural conditions.
Closer bonds are developing between the towns and country districts. Boards of trade are devoting themselves generously to the service of the farm.
The Georgia Chamber of Commerce, one of the most useful organizations of the kind in the Union, is as deeply interested in agriculture as in industry or trade. There could be no surer omen of the well-balanced and sustained development of the Commonwealth.

A loafer is a man who won't work and who can't invent a scheme that will.

The man who buys an automobile on the instalment plan evidently believes in paying as he goes.

Even if you do think your neighbor is a crank he has no license to think you are in the same class.

Holidays, of course, were devised for the sole benefit of officeholders, school teachers, and bankers.

A man may be willing to admit that he is a coward, but how he resents such an inference from another!

The obese female goes on half rations for a week and reduces her weight two ounces, then she gets outside a glass of ice cream soda, and, lo, she gains three pounds.

Walk Well to Think Well.

BY H. ADDINGTON BRUCE.
THE man who would be really efficient has to be a man of many things. By no means the least important is the fact that he can generate a great deal of mental power by the simple device of accustoming himself to hold his body firmly erect when walking.

Slouchiness of carriage has always been condemned, but hitherto chiefly on aesthetic and hygienic grounds. The man who slouches is an offense to the eye, and it has long been known that the better a man walks the better his physical health is likely to be.

Today, in addition to this, it is gradually being recognized that a good walking posture improves both the mind and the character.
There are two causes at work to bring about this result. One of these causes operates directly, the other indirectly.

It is today a commonplace of psychological observation that if a man habitually assumes the characteristic bodily expression of a mental state he will in time find that mental state dominating and coloring his whole outlook on life.

Also it is a commonplace of psychological observation that such mental states as courage, confidence, self-reliance, frankness, and sincerity have as their characteristic bodily expression an involuntary straightening of the entire body, a slight throwing back of the shoulders, and a steady, well-balanced poise of the head.

Let a man, then, habitually assume this attitude when walking, and, through the reflex action of the physical on the mental, he will eventually experience a greater degree of confidence before the inner qualities of which this bodily attitude is the external expression.

In fact, by experiencing these qualities in greater degree, he will do more than improve his character. He will at the same time increase his ability to do good work.
For to be aware—or ought to be—of the awake—the courageous, self-reliant, hopeful man can accomplish much more, and with infinitely less effort, than the man harassed by timidity, doubt, and anxiety.

Still further, as we said above, there is another reason why a good walking posture makes for increased efficiency.
The man who holds himself erect, with shoulders thrown slightly back, gives his lungs freer play than does the stooping, slouching man. This means that he breathes better, and this in turn means that all his physical organs receive a richer supply of blood.

In particular, his brain, the supreme organ of his mind, is better nourished. As a consequence it is the more responsive to the demands put upon it in the course of the working day.
From all of which it follows that the way a man walks is in truth of far greater importance to him than is commonly supposed.

The Journal's Letter Box

The Editor, Atlanta Journal, Atlanta, Ga.
Dear Sir—I am a Virginian, and I would very naturally wish to see all the products of the south sold at as high a price as possible.

I have read many letters as published complaining against the restriction that the British have put upon the cotton trade to the Germans.

Many of these letters have been signed by people whose names speak strongly of German, or Austrian, or Jewish origin.

In not one of these letters have I seen one word of the real reason why the British stop all cotton shipments from reaching Germany, the reason being that it would be insane on the part of the British to allow cotton, which is used and is necessary for the manufacture of the modern high explosives, to reach their enemies.

That this restriction with regard to cotton is being felt by the German government in the manufacture of powder and explosives has been shown by the millions of people who have been signing the manifesto prohibiting the use of cotton in the manufacture of any goods in the district in which Berlin is situated.

Yours very truly,

NO. 259—ANDORRA.
Located in the foothills of the Pyrenees between France and Spain, Andorra is one of the oldest and most beautiful republics in the world. To reach it, you have to climb over the mountains on horseback. The ascent is up barren slopes gauntly ribbed with stone outcrops, your horse often splashing through ankle deep water from the melting snows and cobble fields. "For lunch great wall above it that looks like a fortification, but

You descend to Andorra through a narrow gorge almost filled by a rapid torrent. Gradually it widens.
There are little towns with low white walls and red tile roofs, green valleys dotted with flowers, and slopes

THE SCHOOL OF FIRE—III. Medicos Take the Field

BY FREDERIC J. BARKIN.
A DOCTOR serving with troops in the field is a soldier. Sanitary troops are as essential a part of a military organization as artillery or cavalry, and they must march, camp, endure fire and perform all the other functions of a soldier, except the actual fighting.

This fact was somewhat forcibly impressed upon the members of the medical reserve corps, who gathered at Toiyahanna to learn the duties of an army surgeon. The medical reserve corps, it may be explained, consists of those doctors, routed his distinctions, and their willingness to serve as army surgeons in time of war. This body of about 1,500 men includes a number of the most distinguished specialists and practitioners in the United States. For their training in the military phase of their duties camps have been established in connection with militia schools at Toiyahanna, Pa., Sparta, Wis., and San Antonio, Tex.

At these schools the medics, as they are always called in the army, have a decidedly new experience.
At Toiyahanna, for example, Major Pace, of the regular army, who had charge of the doctors, routed his distinctions, and their willingness to serve as army surgeons in time of war. This body of about 1,500 men includes a number

The training of the doctors consisted in a series of lectures setting forth the duties of sanitary troops in the field, and of a most unique drill, in which all the conditions and exigencies of actual battle were reproduced in minute detail.

This drill was technically called a "problem," and like all other problems dealt with at Toiyahanna, was first set forth and explained on a blackboard. The medics were told that an action was to take place between the front line and the rear line, and that the reds held a strong position on the hillsides across the millpond. The batteries of the blues were to dislodge the reds. A severe action, with heavy firing, was predicted. The batteries of the blues were to dislodge

The problem having been explained, the medics went into the field as a part of the staff of the field and "to" to take up their position behind a stone wall this side of the millpond and open fire (with blank ammunition) upon the imaginary reds. An orderly dashed back to camp, the battery was assembled and rushed into position at a gallop. The guns were carefully concealed with brush, so that they would be invisible to the hostile aeroplanes. Then the order to fire was given and a series of salvos of blank ammunition were fired, creating a very realistic atmosphere of battle.

Meantime three small detachments of regular troops under command of sergeants had arrived just beyond the firing line. Each of these men wore a small flag, as though they were soldiers, to be shipped somewhere by freight. Upon this tag was inscribed a hypothetical wound. Thus, one of them might be labeled "wounded," "killed," "died of shrapnel," or "rifle ball through left shoulder."

A wounded man, like a wounded animal, always seeks cover, and so the medics had been instructed to carefully conceal their wounded men within 200 yards of the firing line. This order was carried out with great exactness, being "killed" or "died of shrapnel,"

NEUTRALITY

BY DR. FRANK CHASE.
THERE is being carried on a systematic agitation in this country against the sale of munitions of war to European nations by American manufacturers.

One educated crank has committed suicide, after attempting to blow himself up with dynamite, to prove his devotion to the cause.

Germans are reported to feel bitterly toward America because American shells are used by the Allies.

German-Americans over here loudly protest against the purchase of American arms by England, France, Italy, Russia and indignantly call upon our government to prohibit it.

No efforts should be spared to make these mistaken people see how twisted is their logic and how unfair is their protest.

Here is the point: Selling arms to belligerents may or may not be right. It is open to dispute. German-Americans will never admit that it is wrong. They urge manufacturers not to engage in this traffic. They may bring all the moral suasion they please to bear upon them. This is a free country.

But for this government to place an embargo upon shipments of arms would be a distinct violation of neutrality.

Any restriction sale of arms here happens to bear hard upon Germany, for the simple reason that Germany cannot get to us. Her ships are bottled up by the enemy.

Personally, I do not believe in the making and selling of war material at all. Many people agree with me. Various firms in the United States have refused to accept profits from the nefarious business.

These profits are, of course, justified in advance-ing, and we may properly use all energy in trying to convert others to our convictions.

But we have no right to advocate that our national government take a step that would be a clear act of hostility to one of the European nations. Our duty is to remain neutral.

Germany has been for years carefully accumulating ammunition for this crisis. She was ready. She is using her immense stores. The allies, on the contrary, are not ready. They are now braving all their energies to get ready.

To properly prepare themselves the allies must purchase supplies where they can. This is the problem in our case would be for us to deprive England and France of all the advantage they have gained by shutting up the German fleet.

The United States has remained splendidly neutral in a very embarrassing situation.

While we have individually expressed our sympathies for the benefit of the medics, one such subject lesson as this, while it might not make a thoroughly trained surgeon out of the ordinary practitioner, would, nevertheless, give him a good idea how to go about his business on the field of battle.

TODAY'S EVENING STORY

THE HOUSE

(Copyright, 1915, by W. W. W. W.)

"I shall die if I have to stay here any longer," Rosanne said to herself. "Or, no, I shall go crazy. I've heard of read that the insane asylums are full of women, farmers' wives, and housekeepers generally, whom moon only has driven mad. And it's true."

Her eyes moved about the room. It was large enough, but low. There was not much in it—a rug, a couch, a heater, two or three chairs, and a table, actual necessities for home-making, and these of the simplest. Eight years before Rosanne and Randal had selected these things and they had not since been changed. Little had been added to them—a picture, perhaps, and a shelf of books. But Rosanne had read the books thrice over and looked at the pictures until she grew weary.

"It is not that I want luxuries," Rosanne thought. "I want change."

The house throughout was like this room. There were needful things but few adornments. All was in exquisite order. Rosanne kept house rarely. She was a born home-maker. Her mother had trained her for wifehood. At twenty she had married Randal because she loved him so much she felt she could not live without him. They had always been happy in their quiet way. If marriage had brought them any disappointment at all it came from the fact that he had no children. And yet they could hardly afford children on Randal's salary. He worked hard for very little money, and while there was hope of an advance it was at present a slight one. The best he could do in these times of stress was to make himself as indispensable as he could and be thankful that he had a job at all.

And the best that Rosanne could do was to rely on him by giving him suitable food and a comfortable place to rest in when he came home worn out at the end of a hard day. She had no wage earning skill, and even if she had she could not have employed it in this little town. In her small humble way she did her best.

For eight years Randal and Rosanne had lived in the shabby little six-room house under the apple tree back from the quietest street in Westmore. They kept up their payments on the place and looked forward to a time when it should be theirs unreservedly. But after the payments were made and the food and fuel and clothing paid for there was nothing left over for the pleasure and pastimes. Randal had not had a vacation since he was married. Neither had Rosanne.

In consequence home had become a kind of prison to her. It was August. Rosanne's neighbors were visiting, visiting, excursions. They came back full of tales, and Rosanne, listening, had a sick longing for something big, better than the four walls of her own house. Today the longing had become almost unbearable. It was a day when there had been little to do. The weather was beautiful, but Rosanne did not feel like going out. What was there to see that she had not been seeing all her life? "If only we could go somewhere," she thought.

Winter was coming. Rosanne was young and her youth was restless. She wondered how she was going to endure that ninth winter without a single bright summer memory to support her. And Randal, too, she thought of him pitying. Yet his mind was divided between home and office; he was contented to one spot. He had at least the semblance of change, she had none. And she was becoming afraid-afraid.

Summer time approached, and bracing herself, she rose and went into the kitchen. She had vegetables to cook which she had grown in their tiny garden, a bit of meat, and apple pie. Randal loved apple pie. When the supper was on the table it looked very inviting. She hoped that Randal might be hungry. He had not had much appetite of late.

Usually his whistling announced him. But tonight he came so quietly that he was in the house before she knew it. He was pale with a strangeness in his look that smote upon her heart. She caught her breath in pain. Then she ran to him and put both arms about him. "Randal! You've lost your job!"

Such possibility was always hanging over them. He held her close. And now he began to smile queerly. "No, dear, no."

"What, then? You're not sick?"

"No, no," he laughed. "I'm not sick. I've scared you. It's only I've had a big piece of good luck. And—and I guess you don't know how to take it." His voice jerked nervously.

seaside resort which they had all their lives heard about, but never had expected to see.

"Our wedding trip!" Randal whispered, nudging her. They had had no wedding trip. They enjoyed that day!

"I don't want to miss a thing," Rosanne said over and over. She was like a child on a holiday. Randal was like another child. Everything they saw was a delight to them.

And then the sea! How it bursts upon one, seen for the first time! How it fulfills one's longing for immensity. THREE WEDNESDAY

For the first time in her life Rosanne rose of a morning with no household tasks to perform after she had eaten her breakfast. She had nothing to do but walk or sit on the sands with Randal. Such a wonderful joy as that was.

For a week they had a honeymoon time of unbroken leisure and close companionship. Then one day Rosanne found that she could read a book tranquilly in the very presence of the sea. Randal could read another book.

After dinner he said: "Boarding house breed isn't your bread, dear. And why breed don't they ever give you a whole boiled potato?"

"I don't know," replied Rosanne. "I only know I'm sick of drinking tea that tastes like a boiled wool blanket."

"The tea's better than the coffee. I never did relish mud-bottom," said Randal.

Two days later they exchanged further confidence. They were sitting on the porch and the afternoon costume parade was at its height.

"I'm so tired of silts and hobbles and wools and paint and beads," sighed Rosanne.

"Do you suppose they're happy?" asked Randal.

"Not so happy as we are, dear. They couldn't be," answered Rosanne. "I

"Are you happier here than you were at home?" persisted Randal.

Rosanne hesitated. "It's different."

"Altogether," said Randal. "I wonder if our red astrachans have begun to fail yet."

"I wonder if Price's dog has trampled down the petunias," mused Rosanne, thoughtfully.

"I'm not going to cry," said Rosanne. "It has been nice, but—"

"I guess home will look good to us," said Randal, boyishly.

And it did—so good! Yet they arrived in a driving rain at the verge of evening. White Randal was building the fire Rosanne ran about turning on light and looking at everything.

"Isn't it cozy? The dear little place!" she cried.

Randal looked at her earnestly. "You're glad to get back—"

"Glad!" Tears ran through her lashes. "Sometimes I've thought you fairly hated it—as I did."

"Ah, but," said Rosanne softly, "you have to go away and stay away to realize what it really means to you. The best part of our vacation is getting back, Randal."

"By George, you're right!" exclaimed Randal.

Wedding of Mrs. Sneed and Mr. Lee Event of Morning

Mrs. G. J. Foreacre, of Charlotte, N. C., announces the marriage of her daughter, Mrs. Della Foreacre Sneed, to Mr. Lee E. Sneed, of Chicago, on Tuesday morning, July 20, at 10 o'clock.

The wedding of Mrs. Sneed and Mr. Lee was quietly solemnized at a dinner party given by the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Harlan, at their home in Oakhurst. The bride wore a charming model of white set with inset medallions of lace, the corsage finished with touches of old blue. Her bouquet was of orchids and valley hills.

Mrs. Lee is the daughter of the late Colonel G. T. Foreacre, one of Atlanta's early distinguished citizens, and is herself a woman of brilliant mental attainments and charming personality. Mr. Lee is the son of the late General Stephen D. Lee, and during his former residence in Atlanta was the partner of Judge John S. Candler in the practice of law. He now resides in Chicago and holds the responsible position of general counsel of the Illinois Central railroad.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee left in the early afternoon for Chicago and later will go to California where they will spend August and a part of September.

AMERICAN FASHIONS

BY LILLIAN H. YOUNG

Washable fabrics or silks can be most effectively used in making up the pretty dress design here shown. If the first variety is selected, marquisette and tulle will work out well together in its development, and if the second, crepe de chine or a combination of chiffon and tulle.

The high-length, skirt-like blouse has a square yoke and a deep, wide, facing about the bottom of tulle, or, in the case of the wash material, eponge; and the same should be used for the lower fitted part of the sleeves. The top of these deep cuffs, the armholes, and the edge of the yoke, show a narrow border trimming carried out in fine eponge. The tiny material is used for the tops of the sleeves and the center of the blouse, which is slightly gathered across the straight line of the yoke in front and back. A pretty trimming is introduced across the back and sides of the blouse just above the hips by setting in a band of tucked material.

This is outlined with a cord above, which is a pleated heading. A pretty collar stands up across the back of the neck and turns away, wing-fashion, from the sides; there is a very tiny vest inside the square lace. The long gathered skirt of the thin material, chiffon or eponge, is weighted at the hem with squares of the same heavy material, which is a finishing cord and pleated heading. If the washable materials are used, the heading must be of the marquisette, and it would probably be better to use the same for the bands of tucking. If less one prefers plain eponge like the yoke, sleeve and blouse border.

TO INTEREST CHILDREN IN BIRD PROTECTION

Dr. T. Gilbert Pearson, of New York, secretary of the National Association of Audubon societies, will launch a movement to interest school children in the study and protection of birds when he speaks at the University of Georgia Wednesday night.

Dr. Pearson hopes to interest teachers of the country in bird study and protection, and 150,000 children, under his direction, are studying the "Audubon Bulletin."

Dr. Pearson would have better protection for non-game birds, and will show how they may be fed during the winter and how nest boxes may be built for them.

Weather Man Says Drop in Temperature Is Due in Few Days

Mr. von Herrmann, the weather man, sees relief from the excessive heat, and makes bold to predict a sharp decline in the temperature. Notwithstanding his assurances, however, those who "lapped" the sun as it peeped over the horizon Tuesday morning felt certain of another hot day ahead. Old Sol looked as "hot" as usual, and his rays every bit as uncomfortable as that of Saturday and Sunday.

But Mr. von Herrmann is quite sure there will be a fall in the temperature. He is confident the moderation that is taking place in the north is headed toward Georgia and Atlanta.

"And," says he, "in a short time—two or three days perhaps—we will have relief from the heat."

The heat wave from which Atlanta and vicinity has been suffering has been general throughout the country, more particularly the cotton belt. The temperature touched 94 in Birmingham Monday, and in Jacksonville was 96; in New Orleans 100, in Charleston 96. The highest temperature registered in Atlanta was 92.
